A Moral Leper.

A few evenlogs since a being in the form and semblature of a sant saw a preity, luteresting little girl of thirteen, wall-grown and finely developed for her age, at the city poet-office, where she had been buying some stamps and receiving the family mail. She accidentally dropped some change, which he kindly picked up for her, and took advantage of this chance acquaintance to contirtue conversation. He accompanied her on the street a couple of squares away, and invited her to go to his looked to get sumsthing to ear which she declined. He was observed by two gentlemen, who knew him, and after he had left the little girl they accepted her and fained her to be a very simple and intelligent child, dreaming of nothing wrong, and her post-office acquaintance to the little girl they accepted her and fained her to be a very simple and intelligent child, dreaming of nothing wrong, and her post-office acquaintance of the second of the post-office acquaintance.
